Who should learn short-hand? Everybody, particularly all students, business and professional men, intelli-cent and thinking people generally who have much writing to do. It will pay.
You will find short-hand useful in a hundred ways, even though you attain only half the speed necessary for ver-batim reporting. Short-hand is exceedingly useful, wonderfully interesting and is fast growing into popular favor.

and is fast growing into popular favor.

You can learn it—even if you are not a gonius? Nor will you regret it afterwards. It requires a little time and patience, and these you have.

The course of leasons here begun will snable the learner, if instructions are carried out, to write short-hand correctly and with a fair rate of speed.

Only one lesson will be given each week. That will be sufficient however, and every learner is urged to master each event. Spend an hour or two each day, or whatever time you can spare, in practicing the characters, writing each one over and over again many times, until you become as familiar with them as with your A B Cs.

Every person who studies these leasons, and becomes a member of the Special Class, will receive eards of introduction to several other students living in different places, with whom he may carry on a correspondence, making use of short-hand characters. Corresponding in short-hand affords most excellent practice, and helps the learner greatly.

Lards of introduction will be issued as seen as three or four lessons have been learned.

soon as three or four lessons have been learned.

Have you joined the class? Send your name and address at once if you have not already done so, and a lesson blank will be mailed to you. Write plainty.

You are recommended to get two or three friends to study with you. Read to each other, practice together, and criticise one anothers' work.

You are advised to put the lessons in a scrap book in proper order for reference; or better still, preserve the papers containing them.

Half an hour or more should be given to practice every day. Write each lesson over and over many times until you feel that you are master of it. Short-hand is a splendid accomplishment, and the editor wiskes you only success in this undertaking.

Ty After studying the lesson, copy Plate I no less than ten times, using a good pen, black ink and foolscap paper.

Compared characters, and be careful to write a small hand, placing the words closely together, pronouncing them aloud as rou write them. Occasionally read over what you have written. Bemember the three rules: I. Practice, 2. Practice, 3. Fractice.

the three rules: I. Practice, 2. Practice, 3. Practice.

Observe carefully the following points: Make the characters or letters, all the name length, rather short, not too long. Place them quile close together, and do not get them crooked. Each stroke abund rest precisely on the line. In line 7 joined beatends below the line. The rule is that the first downward letter should rest on the line. B, d and j are slways struck downwards, and g to the right. Just he you write each letter speak its name aboud. Thus, while you are writing line I, say b, b, and line 2, d, d, d, etc. The letter in line 4 is called gay instand of g. The letter is should be made sharp pointed, and the two lines compening it light, not heavy (see line 9). Its always so written as to point siraignt down. The letter os should be very short—only one-lourth of the length of d. O is struck at a right angle with the letter beside which it is placed. For example, o in line 13 slants to the right in boau, to the left in Job, is horizontal in dough, and vertical in go (line 15). It is so written as to point directly away from the letter, or stem, near which it occurs. B, d, l, g, are consonants, and I, c and g, vowels. The letters, or marks, which express consonants, are called stems; while the dotts, dashes and small angles are called vowel sights.
